

Water Feng Shui Income and Wealth

By TY Tan

In the last issue, I talked about reaping wealth from lucky water features. I discussed the importance of the correct placement of water features and the need for proper timing, two key factors that are more important than the design of the water features itself.

If you plan to install a water feature, such as a fountain, at your premises, the flow and body of water are important feng shui elements that have to be considered when designing the water feature. Flow of water will enhance or drain your income, while the body of water will enhance or drain your wealth.

If you desire more income, the flow of water is important. If you are already wealthy and wish to maintain or keep your wealth, the body of water is what you must look into. Of course, you can reap both income and wealth if your water feature design comes with good flow and a proper body of water.

How the water flows will determine whether it brings you money luck or drains your money luck, while the size of the water flow determines the amount involved.

It is basic knowledge that water flowing towards a property brings money luck and water flowing away from a property means the money will flow out.

On a more advanced level, the correct direction of the water flow (towards the property) and the correct water exit have to be considered.

Once the correct flow of water is determined, the size of the flow is an important consideration. They should run smoothly and in large volume. Don't expect big monetary income when the water's surge is just a trickle.

Indoor and grand outdoor fountains are great as décor features, but they must not be too large, or too small, when compared with the property. Oversized water features can, from an energy standpoint, overpower the occupants. But when it is too small, it will only bring 'small' money.

Finally, you must also like the design of your water feature because beauty and harmony will create a balance between the peaceful and fortunate qi, which is most needed.
